7 Must-Try Barbecue Brunches Around the Southeast

By Christopher Hassiotis | October 14, 2015

People love barbecue so much they get in arguments about it. And people love brunch so much they get in arguments about it. It's surprising, then, that there aren't more barbecue restaurants tapping into the rabid brunch fanbase. (Maybe it's because a lot of traditional BBQ joints close on the weekends.) That's not the case at these Southern spots, though. A number of restaurants in the region have created clever, 'cue-inspired takes on brunch classics, while other more traditional Southern restaurants are incorporating barbecue into their brunch dishes. Dig in.

Birmingham, Alabama: Galley & Garden

Chef James Boyce's fine-dining restaurant is a far cry from a barbecue shack, and his clean, seasonal French-American cuisine is a step above your run-of-the-mill Southern eatery. But that doesn't prevent him from embracing the South on his Sunday brunch menu.

Must-Order: A sandwich featuring root-beer-braised pulled pork, green tomato chow chow and a fried egg served on an everything bagel.

2220 Highland Ave S., Birmingham; 205-939-5551
